Windows Version Numbers: Windows NT 6.2. The invention relates to the field of ground surface water control, and in particular to the field of ground surface water control using a means of channeling, typically by means of ditches. More particularly, the invention relates to the field of increasing the capacity, and thus efficiency, of a ditch for channeling ground surface water flow from one location to another. Almost all agricultural fields have to be irrigated by ground surface water. In order to irrigate such fields, the water must be transferred from a water source, typically a stream or pond, into a point of delivery where it is distributed to the individual units of the field, typically by means of a ditch or channel. One such field is a cereal field, i.e., a field that is planted primarily with crops such as corn, wheat and the like.

Typically, such a field will be subdivided into a series of rows that are separately irrigated with a ditch. Such a ditch typically has inlets at both sides of its path, often adjacent respective sides of the field, and outlets at the ends of the path, generally adjacent the ends of the field. Typically, the inlets are fed by a water source, such as a river or pond, and the outlets release water from the ditch to flow across the field. The water from the inlets feeds the outlets, which, in turn, cause the water to flow across the field from one row to the next. Such flow, in turn, transfers water to the outlets for the next series of rows. Thus, the water is transferred from one point to another point in the field along the ditch as a continuous path of water. Unfortunately, ditches have several disadvantages that can adversely affect the ability of a field to be self-sustaining. Namely, such ditches can increase the demand for water in the field in that the water must flow from a source to many outlets. Even a small increase in demand for water can deplete a small pond or stream, increasing the expense of operating the field. Further, ditches are expensive to build and expensive to install. Typically, ditches are expensive to dig, and installing a ditch requires the laying of a long continuous pipe, e.g., a culvert. In addition, ditches are particularly expensive to maintain and have no tendency to self-repair. In addition to the expense of building and installing a ditch, the capacity of a ditch for a given flow rate tends to be limited
